A nation, whose entire hope of achieving greatness is based on its glorious days of past will never lift a finger to prepare its people for the challenges of tomorrow. People who continuously celebrate the achievement of their ancestors will miss the whole purpose of life.

A religion, whose sole purpose is to collar its people, will never allow its followers to become progressive members of the world community.

In this type of environment, those who try to challenge the oppression of the authority and provide a glimpse of hope for their people will quickly be branded as the traitors of their faith, or "the infidels", as they are called among Muslims.

The leaders of the Islamic nations live in temporary fantasies that were created for them by, mainly the British Petroleum, during the discovery of oil in the Middle East in the early 1900s. These dictatorial regimes have been blinded, by a mirage, into thinking that their foolishly lavish lifestyles can last for ever. They don't realize that the sole purpose of their temporary greatness is tied into the present economic needs of the West. Once that need is subsided, which will soon take place through technological advances of the West, then these nations will be nothing more than what they really are, an aimless group of people locked in an abyss, without any intellectual curiosity.

Are these nations that naive to ignore their not so long past when their countries, without the benefit of oil, were nothing but giant kitty litter boxes?

Are they that foolish to think that this temporary gift that was given to them by the West is going to last longer than the West desires?

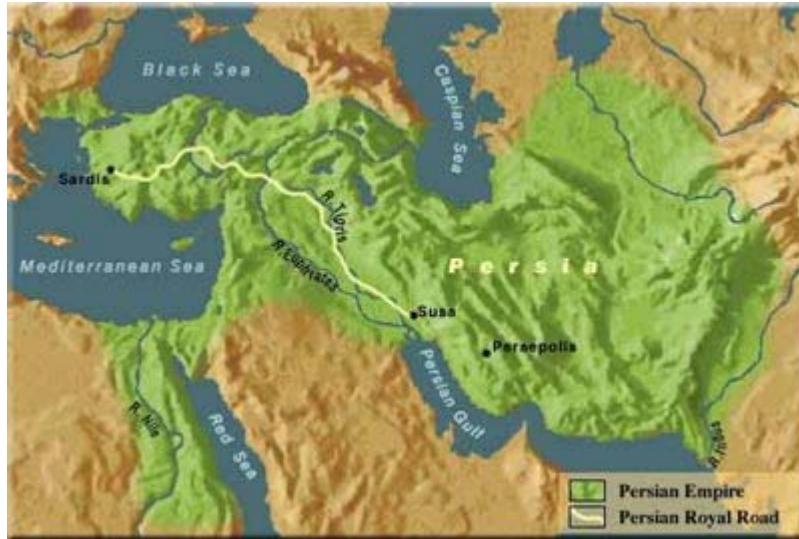

So, the question for you my Iranian friends is this. What type of people do you think we are? Are we the same Iranians who set the agenda for the civilized world nearly 3,000 years ago and through foreign (Arab) intervention lost our aim, or are we blinded by the promises of a religion whose foundation is based on lies and deception? Are we going to stand tall in our region and claim our godly given rights of a proud nation whose progressiveness was the envy of its neighbors prior to the recent invasion of our country twenty five years ago?

Are we going to let an uncivilized culture (Arabs) dominate and destroy teachings of a man (Kurosh) who nearly 3,000 years ago spoke of what the United Nations uses as its motto? Who are you going to look up to? Arabs like Khomeini, Khamenei, and Khatami? Or, Persians like Reza Pahlavi and others like him? The choice is yours to make.

More to come
